Not illustrated. 1871 Excerpt: .and they are unavoidably assumed at almost every step. It is the same in organic growth, movement, and decay. No limb can be moved except by the shortening or lengthening of something; that is by the attraction or repulsion of certain particles. Nothing turns on an axis merely of its own accord. If action of any kind appears to take place without the agency of these forces, as in the nerves perhaps, there is no apparent motion. 23. What then do we mean by attraction and repulsion; these universal postulates in every account of natural phenomena? Do we use them only, as some great thinkers have supposed, to express the fact that, certain changes having occurred hitherto in a certain order, we expect the same order in the same changes? It is true that we do expect it, but is this all; and is this what we mean to say? When a heavy body falls, we say it falls because it is attracted; and when it rests immovable upon the ground, we say it rests because it is attracted. How do we come to use the same word to describe phenomena so entirely different; and why do we feel nevertheless that in both cases we are speaking of the same thing? It is our own muscular sense, we are told, that furnishes us with these ideas. When we draw anything towards ourselves, we have a certain sensation; when we hold anything in its place against opposing...
